Read More > Business & Economy News: BP's $20bn oil discovery is huge - but will it turn out to be economically viable? The world's big oil companies would be forgiven for thinking twice about investing billions of dollars in oil fields that may not be profitable enough to justify the significant risk. There have been a number of oil discoveries over the past decade that have not been profitable enough to justify the required investment, such as Shell's Jubilee South in the United States and BP's Solimana-Canion fields in Mexico. These have demonstrated the gulf between the various oil majors' earnings and expectations, and their ability to fund future exploration and development. To their credit, BP has not been among the losers and is said to be enjoying a profitable decade. According to its latest results, BP's exploration, production and trading segment announced that its revenue and pretax profit rose by 16 per cent over the first nine months of the year. It was, however, hit with a $19bn deficit in its exploration business that has seriously eroded its profits and borrowing ability. In the same period, a $5bn loss in its refining and marketing segment was offset by a $1bn profit from its trading arm. While BP's trading segment has enjoyed a good year, the company's exploration, production and trading segment is still running a substantial deficit, particularly the latter.
