Cognitive resilience: structural brain changes in adolescents and adults with high and low levels of negative life events. Cognitive resilience refers to the process of successfully managing stressful life events. Although several studies have demonstrated that resilience is associated with baseline task-related brain activity, its neural correlates are unknown. To compare resting-state brain anatomy in subjects with different levels of cognitive resilience, and to clarify the role of negative life events (NLE) in the differences. Converging evidence points to the involvement of brain areas involved in the cognitive-emotional control of stress. However, the impact of these processes on cognitive resilience remains unclear. Whole-brain voxel-based morphometry was conducted in adolescent and adult subjects, who were given two tests of cognitive resilience and who were classified into low and high NLE groups. NLE scores were assessed using a widely used instrument. In the high NLE group, the gray matter density of the left caudate was significantly decreased. NLE score was negatively associated with left caudate gray matter density ($r = -0.49$). In addition, gray matter density in the left parahippocampal gyrus was positively correlated with NLE score ($r = 0.47$). The present study is the first, to our knowledge, to show that NLE is associated with the basal ganglia and the parahippocampal gyrus. The calcium paradox in contractile protein heart failure: calcium dynamics in the isolated intact heart. The calcium paradox can occur when cardiomyocytes are exposed to Ca^{2+} -depleted perfusate in the absence of oxygen. It has been reported that this can lead to paracrystalline aggregates of actomyosin and abnormalities of ventricular function. To examine whether this phenomenon occurs in intact myocardium during the development of heart failure, we performed two studies to examine the calcium dynamics in isolated dog hearts during left ventricular dysfunction. In the first study we measured the rapid (10 ms) rise in Ca^{2+} during contraction using a flame photometer (CaF). Steady-state CaF increased from 0.16 ± 0.02 to 0.21 ± 0.02 $\mu\text{mol}\cdot\text{g}^{-1}$, P
