The terms data, information, and knowledge are used throughout this section to refer broadly to any form of data, information, or knowledge that can be conveyed, stored, or processed in some way. These terms reflect the sense in which the term “big data” is used here. This section discusses the key challenges posed by big data in the context of biological data, and points to some promising theoretical, practical, and implementation advances, as well as potential pitfalls. Readers are cautioned that there may be other forms of data and information that have implications for biology but, for reasons of space and complexity, we have focused on the challenges posed by biological data and their potential use in biology. In this section, Big Biology discusses relevant issues surrounding the development of a secure and shared infrastructure to store, analyze and publish large-scale biological data sets. We describe a suite of resources that includes multiple genome-centric data sets and that seeks to create an ecosystem in which researchers can collaborate using standards-compliant bioinformatics tools and environments. We discuss the use of comprehensive data sets that track the physical location, provenance, and metadata of biological samples. The use of complete sample provenance information is necessary for reproducible science. We also discuss how data collected as the product of large-scale experimental studies must be curated or otherwise vetted to ensure that they are of sufficiently high quality. Many large-scale studies generate data that are already available in a public data repository. In addition, we describe how using public data already stored in public repositories can dramatically reduce the time and resources of an experiment. Finally, we discuss how data and information concerning biological samples must be securely archived and made available to researchers in a manner that ensures reproducibility. This section describes some of the most pressing issues in the creation and use of a securely distributed infrastructure to enable the dissemination and exchange of large-scale, comprehensive biological data and information to all users regardless of their physical
