Using a combination of both robot and human aircraft, the first ever manned test of a unique robotic airplane design was conducted Wednesday, May 15, at Moffett Field, Calif. The plane, called the Biplane, is a unique aircraft design that hangs underneath and is therefore difficult to see. The crewed plane was developed at NASA's Ames Research Center by a team led by Chief Technologist Chuck Lorio. The team received funding under NASA's Flight Opportunities and Technology Enterprise (F-O-T-E) programs. The plane has been designed to develop technologies that will enable next generation aircraft to operate in environments of very low visibility. In this scenario, the crew would operate in a small area, in which they could see only the horizon.

They would have to operate using a combination of various sensors and find ways to direct their actions based on their sensory observations, while actively building a map of the topography and environment to enable safe landing. The crew's job would also include operating a crew-operated fixed wing aircraft when visibility is good. "In order to succeed in this mission, the crew has to be able to develop, practice and repeat their procedures," said Gordon Logan, aerospace industry lead for F-O-T-E program. "These tests prove that the team has the ability to design, build, fly and land the plane." The manned biplane is equipped with an array of on board sensors that enable the aircraft to fly autonomously under a variety of environmental conditions including winds exceeding 400 mph and temperatures below 40 degrees Fahrenheit. It incorporates a real time map of the terrain as the crew of two men fly the plane. "The manned tests we are conducting have given us a foundation for our future technology development," said Lorio, also chief technologist at Ames, responsible for
